When someone does their duty,
We call them honorable.

When someone does their duty in the face of danger,
We call them heroes.

When someone goes beyond the call of duty,
We call them … Volunteers.

Michael G. Maness, 2005

I pray this book will help Prison Chaplaincy survive and aid in excellence regarding its solemn and exquisite task in that noblest enterprise of Care for the Soul as staff Chaplains facilitate super-achiever Volunteers in facilitating the greatest source for change in human history—religion.

This important book chronicles an awakening of sorts and shows a critical part of how the legislature responds to the public.

We need chaplains.

Several challenges faced us Texas legislators in 2007. Projections showed we would have 17,000 more prisoners in the Texas Department of Criminal Justice by the year 2012. Faced with that fact, my colleague John Whitmire and I decided to take action. The 150,000-plus prisoners in TDCJ could be seen in two categories: people we were afraid of and people we were mad at. We need prisoners to change into good people, to remove most of the reasons for our anger. Yet, as all know, we need to reserve a place for the dangerous ones.

We decided to emphasize rehabilitation in prison, parole and probation. We wanted to break the cycle of generations of some families coming to prison. We want criminals to stop committing crime, and we believe our programs changed them.

As Maness so forcefully presents, religion is truly the greatest source for change in human history, and our staff chaplains facilitate that. Likewise, we came to see there would be little true cost savings, in that some staffer would have to take care religion in prison—it’s a right after all—and manage the good volunteers.

I like what Maness said, too, in that volunteers should not have to do it all. They are the greatest asset we have, next to the fine staff that works so hard to fulfill the auspicious mission of TDCJ.

We put $241 million to work on drug treatment, alcohol treatment, mental health treatment, specialty courts, and in other prison reforms. We totally revamped the juvenile system to reduce state incarceration of youth. In the large picture and for our efforts to be successful, many groups and individuals had to step up and assist. We found great resources of individuals in the judiciary, the volunteer community, the families of the incarcerated, the probation and parole departments, and in prison education.

Our chaplains were already there doing what we needed, changing the prisoners’ way of thinking.

These groups and more are responsible for the great and needed changes in the Texas criminal justice system, which placed us in the forefront of prison reforms nationally.

Clearly, we had to make sure these efforts remained in place even in difficult times. With the economic bust and reduction in revenue in 2011, the Governor ordered all departments to substantially cut budgets. The TDCJ made many of their recommendations to cut the programs we had instituted in 2007, including cutting drug treatment and programs in probation and parole, and they also included the recommendation to eliminate chaplains.

Whitmire and I knew most of these programs were critical to keeping Texas’ prisons from expanding. We had a lot of allies in the Legislature. Most legislators knew how important these efforts were to keep us from spending billions more dollars on prison expansion. Yet, expansion would take place, we wholeheartedly believed, if these budget cuts were allowed.

So we went to work to save chaplains and save all the treatment programs that we could. A lot of work by a lot of people resulted in almost all of the monies originally cut being restored. Programs were saved. The results got national acclaim.

To date we have saved well over $2 billion, and more importantly our recidivism rate in Texas has dropped from 28 to 21 percent. That means a 25 percent reduction in the number of offenders returning to prison in three years. Not only are our programs working, but we closed three prisons and eight juvenile facilities.

It was a monumental effort.

Our few chaplains, with such a small portion of the TDCJ budget, facilitate religion and a huge Volunteer service that positively changes the thinking and hearts of many prisoners, making our state safer, and our families more wholesome. That is the story of this book, how so few got so many to rise and come to us, their representatives and senators, and showed us what we already knew in our hearts, too, that without faith, it is impossible to please God.

If prisoners will sincerely embrace faith, they will change. They will even more sincerely tackle the other programs, too. And, with respect to bang for one’s buck, there is hardly a more cost-effective program than chaplaincy.

Sincerely,

Regarding this precious and immeasurably valuable record—a treasure—TDCJ staff Chaplains have been in the center of that miracle of human transformation for over a century as they help and facilitate and love Volunteers, helping all persons in the Vital Issues of life, laboring with the Volunteers to minister and care for all inside the prison, even of all faiths, with Christianity by a whopping margin, in that most exquisite of enterprises in Care for the Soul while facilitating the greatest resource for change in human history—religion.

Is Chaplain Professional Equity too much ask for these few humble servants?

311 Item 5, p.72, www.PreciousHeart.net/chaplaincy/RPD-Dunbar-08-2012.pdf, the staff Chaplains facilitated and reported most of these, though not obvious, and no routing.
